“The Texture of the Weave”
Heather Hart, 2022

Heather Hart’s “The Texture of the Weave” installation speaks to the interplay of ideas between different entities and the result of this exchange.

The exhibition features roof-like sculptures and framed, wooden walls. Both are inspired by the carpentry skills Hart learned from her father - invoking the exchange of information between generations. The walls form a labyrinth of corridors in the gallery. As visitors walk through the corridors they activate the space, bringing unique energy and interpretation to work. The participation of visitors invokes the collaborative exchange of meaning between the artist, the work, and the individual.

This exhibition is designed to cultivate and appreciate the ways that individuals all contribute to the “texture of the weave.” Hart, her ancestors, and the audience are all “threads” contributing to the “weave,” here, a metaphor for the greater collective experience of sharing space. The art acknowledges both truths: that the individual and the collective are valid, important and worth celebrating.

1. Identify an elder in your family, friend group or community.

2. Ask them to teach you something they know. For a list of ideas, check out the possibilities box. Some guidance: the information ought to be something activity/skill based. It could be something they learned on their own, or perhaps something they learned from their own elders! It can be super simple or elaborate. What’s important is the passage of knowledge between generations. Consider documenting this learning process either through photo, video, or audio recordings.

3. Thank your elder for their time and expertise.

4. After learning the skill from your elder, think of a way to honor this new information.
   - Incorporate the skill into your creative practice or daily life
   - Publish a written, photo, visual, or audio account of the skill in order to share or preserve the information
   - Demonstrate the skill to others in your social network, giving credit to your elder
